

1 Corinthians 12:25

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

That there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another.

Analysis

That there should be no schism in the body—Hina mē ē schisma en tō sōmati (ἵνα μὴ ἦ σχίσμα ἐν τῷ σώματι)—schisma (σχίσμα, "division, tear, split") is Paul's diagnosis of Corinth's core problem (cf. 1:10, "no divisions among you"). God's compensatory honor-system (vv.22-24) serves one purpose: that there should be no schism. Elevating weaker members prevents the strong from despising them; honoring uncomely members prevents division between haves and have-nots.

But that the members should have the same care one for another—to auto hyper allēlōn merimnōsin ta melē ("the members might have the same concern for one another")—merimnōsin (from merimnaō) means "anxious care, devoted concern." Mutual care (hyper allēlōn, "for one another") characterized by equality (to auto, "the same") prevents division. Eyes care for feet; head cares for hands. No hierarchy of concern where prominent members receive attention while hidden members are neglected. God's design creates interdependence producing mutual investment in each member's flourishing.

Historical Context

Corinth's church was fractured by class divisions—wealthy patrons hosting house churches, poor believers marginalized at the Lord's Supper (11:20-22). Paul's body-theology demands equal care regardless of social status, directly challenging their stratified society.
