

1 Corinthians 15:35

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?

Analysis

But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? (Ἀλλὰ ἐρεῖ τις, Πῶς ἐγείρονται οἱ νεκροί;)—Paul anticipates the skeptic's objection: resurrection is mechanistically impossible. The verb egeirontai (ἐγείρονται, "are raised") uses passive voice—God raises the dead; they don't self-resurrect. The question pōs (πῶς, "how") demands mechanism, process, explanation.

And with what body do they come? (ποῖω δὲ σώματι ἔρχονται;)—The second question addresses identity and continuity. If the body decays, decomposes, is eaten by animals or burns to ash, how can it be reconstituted? What about amputees? The obese and emaciated? Greek philosophy found bodily resurrection absurd—souls yes, bodies no. Paul will answer with agricultural analogy (vv. 36-49) demonstrating continuity-in-transformation.

Historical Context

Greek intellectual culture mocked bodily resurrection (Acts 17:32). Plato taught the body is the soul's prison; release from embodiment was salvation. Platonism's influence on Corinthian believers created this objection. They couldn't conceive how decayed corpses could be reconstituted. Paul doesn't mock the question but addresses it seriously with theological and analogical reasoning.

Study Questions

1. Why does Greek philosophical dualism find bodily resurrection repugnant—what does this reveal about biblical vs. Greek anthropology?
2. How do modern objections to resurrection (scientific naturalism) parallel ancient Greek objections?
3. What does the 'what body' question indicate about concerns over identity and continuity?
