

1 Corinthians 4:2

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful.

Analysis

Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful. The Greek zeteitai (ζητεῖται, "is required/sought") emphasizes an active standard being applied. Pistos (πιστός, "faithful/trustworthy") is the supreme qualification for stewards—not eloquence, popularity, or impressive results, but reliability in handling what belongs to another.

This verse dismantles the Corinthians' evaluation criteria. They assessed teachers by rhetorical polish and philosophical sophistication (2:1-5); Paul insists the only metric that matters is fidelity to the gospel entrusted. A steward's success is measured not by how many followers he attracts or how innovative his teaching appears, but whether he accurately represents his master's interests. The passive construction ("it is required") points to an objective divine standard, not congregational opinion polls.

Historical Context

In Greco-Roman households, stewards (oikonomoi) managed significant assets and slave labor. Their masters demanded faithful accounting; embezzlement or negligence brought severe consequences. Paul applies this commercial metaphor theologically: apostles are managers of divine revelation, accountable ultimately to Christ (v. 4), not to human tribunals. The Corinthian church's forensic language ("judged," v. 3) reflects their eagerness to evaluate teachers—a practice Paul resists.

Study Questions

1. What does faithfulness to God's Word look like in your specific ministry context, even when it's unpopular or counter-cultural?
2. How do you measure spiritual 'success'—by visible results and human approval, or by faithful obedience to what God has revealed?
3. In what areas might you be compromising gospel clarity for the sake of relevance or acceptance?
