

1 Corinthians 9:19

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more.

Analysis

For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more. Paul introduces his missionary strategy of voluntary enslavement. The Greek eleutheros (ἐλεύθερος, "free") echoes verse 1; as an apostle, Paul has liberty from human authority and cultural expectations. Yet he chose to become a doulos (δοῦλος, "slave, servant") to everyone. This is not compulsion but strategic self-limitation.

The phrase "gain the more" (Greek kerdainō, κερδαίνω, "win, gain") is repeated five times (v. 19-22), emphasizing Paul's evangelistic purpose. He surrenders freedom to maximize conversions. This is the practical application of chapter 8's theology: the strong limit liberty for the weak. Paul becomes "all things to all men" (v. 22), adapting culturally without compromising doctrinally. This is missional flexibility—refusing to let secondary issues (food, cultural customs, financial support) obstruct the gospel. Paul models what he commands.

Historical Context

In Greco-Roman society, freedom (eleutheria) was prized above nearly all virtues. Slaves dreamed of manumission; citizens defended political liberty; philosophers extolled moral autonomy. Paul's voluntary enslavement was countercultural and shocking—like a freed slave choosing to return to bondage. Yet Christ did the same (Phil 2:6-7), and Paul follows His pattern: freedom expressed through sacrificial service.
