

1 John 2:21

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth.

Analysis

I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth. John clarifies his motivation for writing. "I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth" (ouk egrapsa hymin hoti ouk oideate tēn alētheian)—John doesn't write as if addressing ignorant people needing basic instruction. He assumes his readers possess fundamental knowledge of gospel truth through the Spirit's anointing (verse 20). This isn't condescension but affirmation of their spiritual state.

"But because ye know it" (all' hoti oideate autēn)—John writes precisely because they do know the truth. His letter reinforces and confirms what they already know, helping them recognize error by reminding them of truth. This is pastoral ministry: not constant novelty but faithful reiteration of apostolic gospel, strengthening believers' grasp of essential truth they already possess through the Spirit's teaching.

"And that no lie is of the truth" (kai hoti pan pseudos ek tēs alētheias ouk estin)—this categorical statement establishes truth's exclusive nature. "No lie" (pan pseudos, every lie) and "the truth" are mutually exclusive categories with different origins. Truth comes from God; lies from the father of lies (John 8:44). Believers who know the truth through the Spirit can recognize lies by their incompatibility with revealed truth. The antichrists' denials of Christ (verse 22) are lies, demonstrably incompatible with the truth believers already know.

Historical Context

Paul similarly affirmed believers' knowledge while continuing to teach them (Romans 15:14, 1 Thessalonians 4:9). This wasn't flattery but recognition that the Spirit teaches all believers essential truths. Yet even Spirit-taught believers benefit from apostolic teaching reinforcing and clarifying truth. The Bereans, though commended for examining Paul's teaching against Scripture (Acts 17:11), still needed Paul's instruction.

In John's context, false teachers implied ordinary believers lacked true knowledge, needing the Gnostics' superior revelation. John counters: believers already know truth through the Spirit; the Gnostic teaching is the lie, contradicting truth believers possess. This empowered ordinary Christians to reject sophisticated-sounding error based on the Spirit's internal witness to truth.

The Reformation principle of testimonium Spiritus Sancti internum (internal testimony of the Holy Spirit) developed from passages like this. The Spirit witnesses to Scripture's truth in believers' hearts, providing conviction that goes beyond rational argumentation. Calvin taught that while external evidences support Scripture's authority, the Spirit's internal witness provides ultimate certainty. Believers know truth not merely intellectually but spiritually, through the Spirit's anointing.
