

1 John 5:9

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God which he hath testified of his Son.

Analysis

If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God which he hath testified of his Son. John argues from lesser to greater. "If we receive the witness of men" (ei tēn martyrian tōn anthrōpōn lambanomen)—we routinely accept human testimony in daily life. Courts rely on witnesses, we believe testimony about events we didn't see, commerce depends on trusting others' word. Human testimony, though fallible, serves as basis for decisions and beliefs.

"The witness of God is greater" (hē martyria tou theou meizōn estin)—how much more reliable is divine testimony! God cannot lie (Titus 1:2, Hebrews 6:18), is omniscient (knowing all truth), and is omnipotent (able to ensure His testimony reaches us). If we trust imperfect human witnesses, how much more should we trust God's perfect witness? This is an a fortiori argument—from the lesser accepted truth to the greater certain truth.

"For this is the witness of God which he hath testified of his Son" (hoti autē estin hē martyria tou theou hēn memartyrēken peri tou huiou autou). The perfect tense indicates God's testimony is complete with continuing validity. God testified through the Father's voice at Jesus's baptism and transfiguration, through Christ's miracles and resurrection, through the Spirit's witness, and through apostolic preaching. This comprehensive divine testimony about Christ provides unshakeable foundation for faith. Rejecting God's testimony about His Son is incomparably more serious than rejecting human testimony—it effectively calls God a liar (v. 10).

Historical Context

The reliability of testimony was central to ancient jurisprudence and philosophy. Greek philosophers debated epistemology—how we know truth. Skeptics questioned all knowledge; others accepted testimony as valid knowledge source. John builds on common sense—we necessarily rely on testimony. He then argues that God's testimony is supremely reliable, being omniscient and truthful.

Jewish tradition emphasized God's witness through Scripture, prophets, and mighty acts. The apostles proclaimed themselves eyewitnesses but grounded their authority in God's commissioning. Early Christian apologetics used fulfilled prophecy, miracles, and the resurrection as God's testimony to Christ. This objective divine witness complemented subjective Spirit's testimony, providing both external and internal certainty.

Study Questions

1. How does recognizing that you routinely accept human testimony make rejecting God's testimony about Christ inconsistent and unreasonable?
2. What specific elements of God's testimony about His Son (Scripture, miracles, resurrection, Spirit's witness) provide your strongest assurance?
3. If God's witness is infinitely more reliable than human witness, how should this affect your confidence in biblical testimony about Christ?
