

1 Peter 3:13

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?

Analysis

Peter asks rhetorical question about suffering for righteousness. "And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?" (kai tis ho kakōsōn hymas ean tou agathou zēlōtai genēsthe). "Followers" (zēlōtai) means zealous imitators, enthusiastic pursuers. The logic: generally speaking, those zealously doing good encounter less opposition than evildoers. Most people respect virtue even if they don't practice it. However, verse 14 acknowledges exceptions—sometimes righteous suffer. The point: zealous goodness normally provides some protection, though not absolute immunity from suffering.

Historical Context

Peter's question reflects general principle: societies usually reward virtue or at least tolerate it, making righteous less likely targets than criminals. However, this isn't absolute—Christians faced persecution precisely for righteousness. Peter balances realism (some suffer for righteousness, v.14) with encouragement (righteous living normally brings protection). Early church observed this dynamic: many Christians lived peaceably, respected by neighbors; others suffered violently. The difference often depended on local authorities' attitudes and accusations' credibility. Christian virtue sometimes won respect and protection, other times provoked persecution.
