

2 Corinthians 5:8

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord.

Analysis

We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord—Paul repeats tharroumen (θαρροῦμεν, "we are confident") and introduces eudokoumen (εὐδοκοῦμεν, "we are well-pleased, we prefer"). This is bold personal preference: death's prospect brings not dread but desire. Ekdēmēsai (ἐκδημῆσαι, aorist infinitive, "to be away from home") from the body means endēmēsai pros ton Kyrion (ἐνδημῆσαι πρὸς τὸν Κύριον, "to be at home with the Lord").

The preposition pros (πρός, "toward, with") indicates intimate proximity—face-to-face presence. This verse anchors Christian hope: death is not annihilation or soul-sleep but conscious, personal fellowship with Christ (Philippians 1:23, "to depart and be with Christ is far better"). Paul's preference for death over earthly life demonstrates radical Christ-centeredness—his ultimate treasure is Christ Himself, not earthly comfort or ministry success. Yet this isn't death-wish but prioritization: better than earthly pilgrimage is heavenly homecoming.

Historical Context

Paul likely wrote this after narrowly escaping death in Asia (1:8-10). His perspective wasn't theoretical but forged through suffering. Ancient martyrs' accounts show Christians facing death with inexplicable joy—outsiders found this baffling. Paul's theology explains this: death is doorway to Christ's presence, making martyrdom gain, not loss.

Study Questions

1. Can you honestly say you would "rather" be with Christ than continue earthly life—what does your answer reveal about your values?
2. How does Paul's confidence about immediate presence with Christ after death address fears about what happens when we die?
3. What would need to change in your life for Christ Himself (not heaven's rewards) to be your primary longing?
