

Acts 23:15

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Now therefore ye with the council signify to the chief captain that he bring him down unto you to morrow, as though ye would enquire something more perfectly concerning him: and we, or ever he come near, are ready to kill him.

Analysis

Now therefore ye with the council signify to the chief captain—Over forty men conspired with Sanhedrin members to murder Paul under pretense of further inquiry (v. 12-14). The verb emphanisate (make clear/inform) shows their plan required official cooperation. As though ye would enquire something more perfectly (ἀκριβέστερον, akribesteron, more accurately)—The adverb 'more perfectly' gave the plot appearance of legitimate judicial procedure, masking murderous intent with religious language.

We, or ever he come near, are ready to kill him—The conspirators' confidence reveals their fanaticism: bound by oath, fasting until Paul's death (v. 12). This plot demonstrates how religious zeal untethered from righteousness produces violence. The irony is stark—those claiming to defend God's law planned premeditated murder in God's name, violating the sixth commandment while invoking the first.

Historical Context

Assassinations by zealots were common in this volatile period. The forty-plus conspirators likely included sicarii willing to die for their cause. That Sanhedrin members cooperated shows the depth of opposition to Paul's gospel. Roman protective custody proved providential—God used pagan justice to thwart religious assassination.
