

Acts 26:1

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself. Then Paul stretched forth the hand, and answered for himself:

Analysis

Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself (ἐπιτρέπεται σοι)—The verb epitrepō means 'to allow, give permission,' a formal legal term granting Paul the floor. King Agrippa II, ruling tetrarch and expert in Jewish customs (v. 3), presides as judge. Then Paul stretched forth the hand (ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα)—the classical rhetorical gesture (chironomia) of an orator beginning his defense, signaling both respect and confidence.

Answered for himself (ἀπελογεῖτο)—apologeomai, from which we get 'apologetics,' means to make a formal legal defense. This is Paul's third and final defense speech in Acts (22:1-21, 24:10-21, 26:2-29), his most polished oration. Before kings and governors, Christ's promise is fulfilled: 'I will give you a mouth and wisdom' (Luke 21:15). Paul's defense becomes gospel proclamation—the prisoner evangelizes his judge.

Historical Context

Paul stands before Herod Agrippa II (AD 27-92/93), great-grandson of Herod the Great, and his sister Bernice (around AD 59-60). Festus, the Roman procurator, arranged this hearing to formulate charges for Caesar. Agrippa held no jurisdiction but possessed expertise in Jewish law—making him the ideal audience for Paul's testimony about Pharisaic resurrection hope and Christ's fulfillment of Messianic prophecy.

Study Questions

1. When given opportunity to defend yourself, do you use it merely for self-justification, or like Paul, to bear witness to Christ?
2. How does Paul's rhetorical eloquence demonstrate that the gospel doesn't despise cultural excellence but redeems and employs it for God's glory?
