

Acts 27:25

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer: for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me.

Analysis

---

Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer (εὐθυμεῖτε, euthymeite)—Paul uses the imperative form meaning "take courage" or "be cheerful," the same root Jesus used in John 16:33 (tharseite). Despite being a prisoner, Paul speaks with apostolic authority to seasoned sailors and Roman soldiers.

For I believe God (πιστεύω γὰρ τῷ θεῷ, pisteuō gar tō theō)—This is saving faith (pistis) demonstrated under trial. Paul's confidence rests not in circumstances but in God's revealed word through the angel (v. 23-24). The conjunction gar ("for") grounds his exhortation in divine revelation. That it shall be even as it was told me—Paul affirms the reliability of God's promise. This echoes Abraham's faith (Romans 4:21) and models the Christian response to adversity: believing God's word despite contrary circumstances.

Historical Context

This occurred during Paul's voyage to Rome as a prisoner (AD 59-60), likely sailing from Myra to Malta via Crete during dangerous autumn weather. Ancient Mediterranean shipping typically ceased November-March. Paul had already warned against sailing (v. 10), but the centurion trusted the ship's pilot. After fourteen days drifting in a northeaster storm, all 276 aboard faced certain death until Paul's angelic visitation brought divine assurance.

Study Questions

1. When facing your own "storms," do you ground your confidence in God's revealed promises in Scripture, or in favorable circumstances?
2. How does Paul's credibility among unbelievers (earned through earlier wisdom, v. 10) give him a platform to testify to God's faithfulness in crisis?
