

Deuteronomy 1:43

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

So I spake unto you; and ye would not hear, but rebelled against the commandment of the LORD, and went presumptuously up into the hill.

Analysis

Israel's persistent rebellion—"ye would not hear, but rebelled"—demonstrates the pattern of covenant violation. The Hebrew 'tamaradu' (rebelled) indicates willful defiance of divine authority. Having rejected God's command to advance in faith, they now reject His command to refrain. This double rebellion reveals the human heart's natural enmity against God (Romans 8:7). Their presumption in going up 'presumptuously' (Hebrew 'zidu') without authorization illustrates that disobedience takes many forms—both refusal to act in faith and unauthorized religious zeal stem from the same root of self-will.

Historical Context

Describes Israel's reckless military campaign circa 1445 BC despite Moses' explicit warning. They advanced into the hill country without the Ark of the Covenant, without Moses' leadership, and crucially, without God's presence or blessing. This unauthorized offensive against the Amalekites and Canaanites ended in catastrophic defeat (Numbers 14:45).
