

Deuteronomy 12:20

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

When the LORD thy God shall enlarge thy border, as he hath promised thee, and thou shalt say, I will eat flesh, because thy soul longeth to eat flesh; thou mayest eat flesh, whatsoever thy soul lusteth after.

Analysis

Future territorial expansion: 'When the LORD thy God shall enlarge thy border, as he hath promised thee, and thou shalt say, I will eat flesh, because thy soul longeth to eat flesh; thou mayest eat flesh, whatsoever thy soul lusteth after.' This anticipates blessing of increased territory making sanctuary even more distant. God accommodates this by permitting meat consumption despite distance. The phrase 'enlarge thy border' recalls promises to Abraham (Genesis 15:18-21). God's blessing (territorial expansion) creates practical challenges (distance from sanctuary), which His law addresses. This shows divine law's flexibility regarding circumstances while maintaining principles.

Historical Context

The promised borders (Deuteronomy 11:24; Genesis 15:18) extended from Euphrates to Mediterranean. David and Solomon achieved near-fulfillment (2 Samuel 8; 1 Kings 4:21), though never permanent. The territorial promise remains partially unfulfilled, awaiting Messianic consummation. This verse's provision for distance assumes blessing of expansion, showing covenant obedience brings prosperity requiring practical accommodation.
