

Deuteronomy 2:34

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And we took all his cities at that time, and utterly destroyed the men, and the women, and the little ones, of every city, we left none to remain:

Analysis

The systematic conquest 'we took all his cities at that time, and utterly destroyed the men, and the women, and the little ones, of every city' describes herem warfare's complete nature. The exception 'we left none to remain' emphasizes thoroughness. This severe judgment served multiple purposes: punishing incorrigible wickedness, preventing cultural contamination, and ensuring Israel's security. While difficult for modern sensibilities, it demonstrates sin's gravity and holiness' demands.

Historical Context

Herem (devoted destruction) was commanded primarily for Canaanite nations whose wickedness had reached full measure (Genesis 15:16). The Amorites practiced child sacrifice, temple prostitution, and other abominations. God's patient forbearance had allowed centuries for repentance; when judgment came, it was both just and final. This severity protected Israel from adopting such practices.
