

Deuteronomy 33:26

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, who rideth upon the heaven in thy help, and in his excellency on the sky.

Analysis

---

There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun—After blessing individual tribes, Moses concludes with a hymn celebrating Israel's incomparable God. Jeshurun (upright one) is a poetic name for Israel (Deuteronomy 32:15; Isaiah 44:2), emphasizing their covenant identity, not ethnic origin. Ein ka'El Yeshurun establishes monotheistic uniqueness—Israel's God has no peer, rival, or equal among the nations' false deities.

Who rideth upon the heaven in thy help, and in his excellency on the sky—Rokhev shamayim (rider of the heavens) was a title claimed by Canaanite Baal, the storm god. Moses deliberately appropriates this imagery, asserting YHWH's supremacy over weather deities. The Hebrew shechaqim (clouds/skies) emphasizes God's transcendence and power. Unlike impotent idols, Israel's God controls nature itself, deploying creation be'ezreka (in your help)—for covenant purposes, delivering His people.

Historical Context

This verse functions as a theological climax before Moses's death narrative. The 'rider of the clouds' language directly confronts Canaanite religion, where Baal was titled 'cloud-rider' (Ugaritic texts). Moses declares YHWH's supremacy over all supposed storm gods. The poetic style resembles ancient Near Eastern divine warrior hymns but radically reinterprets them within monotheistic covenant theology. Later, Jesus applies this cloud imagery to Himself (Daniel 7:13; Mark 14:62), claiming divine authority.

Study Questions

1. What modern 'gods' claim power over creation, and how does YHWH's uniqueness challenge those false securities?
2. How does understanding God's transcendence ('riding the heavens') affect your confidence in His ability to help you?
