

Esther 1:15

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

What shall we do unto the queen Vashti according to law, because she hath not performed the commandment of the king Ahasuerus by the chamberlains?

Analysis

Legal question: 'What shall we do unto the queen Vashti according to law, because she hath not performed the commandment of the king Ahasuerus by the chamberlains?' The king asks for legal judgment—what does law require for disobedience to royal command? This legal formulation made the matter official state business rather than private marital dispute. The question's phrasing assumed punishment was necessary; only severity needed determination. This legal proceeding, though unjust from Vashti's perspective (refusing degradation), became mechanism positioning Esther for future salvation of Jews. God's providence works through unjust human legal systems to accomplish His purposes.

Historical Context

Persian law's immutability (Daniel 6:8, 12; Esther 8:8) meant legal decisions, once made and sealed, couldn't be reversed. This made the counselors' advice crucial—their recommendation would become irreversible law. Ancient Near Eastern legal systems emphasized precedent and consistency, making this consultation about proper punishment for disobedience significant beyond Vashti herself. The legal framing transformed personal conflict into constitutional crisis about royal authority and proper social order, elevating stakes and ensuring whatever decision was made would be permanent and binding.
