

Esther 1:20

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And when the king's decree which he shall make shall be published throughout all his empire, (for it is great,) all the wives shall give to their husbands honour, both to great and small.

Analysis

Intended effect: 'And when the king's decree which he shall make shall be published throughout all his empire, (for it is great,) all the wives shall give to their husbands honour, both to great and small'. The counselors predict empire-wide decree will compel wifely obedience throughout the realm—women will honor husbands from fear of Vashti's fate. The parenthetical '(for it is great)' emphasizes the empire's vastness, suggesting the decree's reach and impact. The belief that public example would compel submission throughout the empire shows ancient understanding of law's pedagogical function—punishment demonstrates consequences, deterring others. This reasoning, though based on fear rather than love, became God's tool for positioning Esther.

Historical Context

Ancient empires maintained control partly through public examples—severe punishment for prominent violators deterred others. The Persian Empire's vast extent ('from India to Ethiopia,' v. 1) made consistent application of social norms challenging, requiring spectacular examples to maintain order. The counselors' belief that Vashti's banishment would be known throughout the empire and compel wifely obedience shows both ancient communication effectiveness and reliance on fear as social control. Archaeological evidence shows ancient empires used imperial decrees to standardize practices across diverse populations and territories.
