

Esther 4:6

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

So Hatach went forth to Mordecai unto the street of the city, which was before the king's gate.

Analysis

So Hatach went forth to Mordecai unto the street of the city, which was before the king's gate. Hatach obeyed Esther's command, finding Mordecai in the street before the king's gate—the closest Mordecai could approach while wearing sackcloth (v. 2). This verse demonstrates providence working through faithful servants at multiple levels: Esther seeking information, Hatach serving as reliable messenger, Mordecai maintaining his vigil. The location—"before the king's gate"—symbolizes Mordecai's position: near power but temporarily excluded by crisis, yet positioned to communicate with those inside. God's providence operates through ordinary faithful service by people like Hatach whose names might otherwise be forgotten.

Historical Context

Hatach's role as trusted intermediary proved crucial for the entire deliverance narrative. Without reliable, discreet messengers, Esther and Mordecai couldn't have coordinated their response. Eunuch servants in Persian courts held positions of trust precisely because their dependent status and lack of family ambitions made them reliable. The street before the king's gate would have been public space where Mordecai's mourning was visible, serving both to express genuine grief and to send a signal that something was gravely wrong. Archaeological evidence shows ancient palace complexes had public areas outside gates where officials and citizens could gather.
