

Ezekiel 1:26

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And above the firmament that was over their heads was the likeness of a throne, as the appearance of a sapphire stone: and upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of a man above upon it.

Analysis

This verse reaches the vision's climax—the throne of God and the divine figure seated upon it. The progression through firmament, wheels, and living creatures culminates in 'the likeness of a throne' with 'the likeness as the appearance of a man' seated above. The triple hedging ('likeness,' 'appearance,' 'likeness') emphasizes transcendence—this is as close as human language can approach the ineffable. The sapphire throne (eben sappir) echoes Exodus 24:10, where Moses saw God's feet upon a sapphire pavement, connecting this vision to Israel's covenant history. The human-like figure on the throne reveals God's person, anticipating the incarnation where deity assumes humanity fully in Christ. Reformed theology has traditionally seen this as a Christophany—a pre-incarnate appearance of the Son, who is 'the image of the invisible God' (Colossians 1:15). The throne imagery emphasizes sovereignty—God rules over nations, including Babylon, and His purposes cannot be thwarted by exile.

Historical Context

Ancient Near Eastern kings sat on elevated thrones to symbolize authority and dominance. Solomon's throne of ivory overlaid with gold (1 Kings 10:18-20) represented Israel's zenith, but even it paled before this vision of the heavenly throne. The exiles needed assurance that though Judah's earthly throne had fallen, the divine King remained enthroned in sovereign majesty. This vision rebukes the notion that Babylon's conquest of Jerusalem indicated Marduk's superiority over Yahweh. Instead, God's throne-chariot mobility showed He sovereignly moved with His people, maintaining covenant relationship despite judgment. The sapphire's blue color evoked heaven's transcendence, distinguishing the divine throne from earthly counterparts.

Study Questions

1. How does the vision of God's throne provide comfort and assurance when earthly powers seem to triumph over God's people?
2. What does the human-like appearance of the figure on the throne reveal about God's nature and His intention to relate personally to humanity?
