

Ezekiel 26:14

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And I will make thee like the top of a rock: thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon; thou shalt be built no more: for I the LORD have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD.

Analysis

And I will make thee like the top of a rock repeats verse 4's imagery—bare, scraped clean. Thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon confirms fishing village status. Thou shalt be built no more declares permanent diminishment. For I the LORD have spoken it, saith the Lord GOD seals the prophecy with divine authority. The repetition emphasizes certainty. The phrase built no more doesn't mean absolutely never rebuilt but never restored to former glory. Tyre exists today but never regained its ancient dominance. God's judgments may not mean total annihilation but permanent humiliation—reduction from empire to insignificance.

Historical Context

Tyre still exists as the Lebanese city of Sur, but it never regained the power and glory of the Phoenician empire. From world-spanning maritime superpower, it became a minor Mediterranean port. Though rebuilt multiple times by various powers (Roman, Byzantine, Crusader, Arab), it remained a shadow of its former self, exactly fulfilling 'thou shalt be built no more'—not absolutely, but never to former glory.

Study Questions

1. What does permanent diminishment rather than total annihilation teach about divine judgment?
2. How do we know when we've been reduced from glory to insignificance?
3. What causes empires and individuals to be permanently humbled?
