

Ezekiel 27:36

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

The merchants among the people shall hiss at thee; thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt be any more.

Analysis

The merchants among the people shall hiss at thee; thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt be any more—The final verse: סֹחְרִים בְּעַמִּים (sōḥrîm bā‘ammîm, 'traders among the peoples') שָׂרְקוּ עָלֶיךָ (shārēqû ‘ālayik, 'hiss at you'). The verb שָׂרַק (shāraq) indicates shocked derision, a hissing sound expressing horror and contempt (1 Kings 9:8, Jeremiah 19:8).

Thou shalt be a terror—בְּלָהוֹת הָיִיתָ (ballāhôt hāyît, 'terrors you have become'), an object lesson of judgment. And never shalt be any more—וְאַיִןךָ עַד-עוֹלָם (wě’ênēkh ‘ad-‘ôlām, 'and you are not until eternity'). This concludes the extended lament (chapters 26-28) with finality: Tyre's commercial glory is permanently ended. Those who profited from her trade now mock her—fair-weather friends revealed when prosperity ends. The chapter warns against building identity on economic achievement, participating in systems built on pride, or trusting wealth for security. Only God's kingdom endures; all else is vapor (James 4:14).

Historical Context

Ezekiel 26-28 was written circa 586 BC. Babylon besieged Tyre 585-573 BC. Alexander destroyed it completely 332 BC. By Roman times, Tyre was a minor port. Today, it's a small Lebanese city with ancient ruins—literally 'a terror and never shall be any more' as a commercial empire. The prophecy's fulfillment over centuries demonstrates God's sovereignty over history.

Study Questions

1. Why do those who profited from a system mock it when it falls?
2. What does Tyre becoming 'a terror'—a cautionary example—teach subsequent generations?
3. How should believers invest their lives to avoid Tyre's fate of building on temporal foundations?
