

Ezekiel 28:12

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Son of man, take up a lamentation upon the king of Tyrus, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord GOD; Thou sealest up the sum, full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty.

Analysis

Shifting from the prince to 'the king of Tyre,' God says: 'Thou sealest up the sum, full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty.' The Hebrew 'chotem toknit' (חֹתֶם תָּקִינִית) suggests the final measure or perfect model. The description 'full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty' seems excessive for any human king, leading many interpreters to see dual reference—the earthly king of Tyre as the immediate referent, but with language transcending human rulers to describe Satan himself. Like Isaiah 14:12-15 (the fall of the 'star of the morning'), this passage appears to use an earthly tyrant as a type pointing to the archetypal rebel—Satan. Verses 13-15 describe this being in Eden, walking among fiery stones as a guardian cherub, created perfect but falling through pride. Whether primarily about Satan or using hyperbolic language for Tyre's king, the passage reveals that human pride reflects and recapitulates satanic rebellion.

Historical Context

Ancient Near Eastern royal ideology often used divine or semi-divine language for kings. Egyptian pharaohs claimed divinity, and Mesopotamian kings were described as gods' representatives. Tyre's commercial success and cultural sophistication made its rulers particularly proud. However, the language in Ezekiel 28:13-15 exceeds even exaggerated royal rhetoric, describing prelapsarian perfection in Eden and cherubic status. Church fathers (Origen, Gregory, Jerome) and many Reformed interpreters saw this as referencing Satan's fall, while others view it as prophetic hyperbole exposing Tyre's arrogance. Either way, the passage reveals that creaturely pride—whether angelic or human—always ends in judgment and fall.
