

Ezekiel 3:16

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And it came to pass at the end of seven days, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

Analysis

"And it came to pass at the end of seven days, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying..." After seven days of silent identification, God speaks. The timing demonstrates that understanding precedes proclamation. Ministers must first grasp people's contexts before delivering messages. The pattern appears throughout Scripture: observation, then revelation, then proclamation. This guards against hasty speech divorced from pastoral sensitivity. The Reformed emphasis on calling includes both divine commission and human preparation—understanding both God's Word and people's circumstances.

Historical Context

After absorbing the exiles' trauma (593 BC), Ezekiel received specific ministry direction. The seven-day delay wasn't divine neglect but providential preparation. God shapes ministers through experience before commissioning them for service. This principle appears in Moses' wilderness training, Paul's Arabian sojourn, and Jesus' preparation period. Hasty ministry without understanding produces ineffective, insensitive proclamation. God prepares thoroughly before deploying His servants.
