

Ezekiel 34:23

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd.

Analysis

God promises: 'And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd.' This messianic prophecy promises a future Davidic shepherd-king. The phrase 'my servant David' cannot refer to the historical David (dead for 400+ years) but to David's greater Son—the Messiah. The singular 'one shepherd' contrasts with the many failed shepherds just condemned (34:2-10) and points to unity under one ruler. The verb 'feed' (ra'ah, רָאַה) means to shepherd, pasture, and provide for—comprehensive care. Jesus Christ fulfills this as the Son of David (Matthew 1:1, Luke 1:32-33) who shepherds God's people. The promise anticipates both Christ's first coming (inaugurating God's kingdom) and second coming (consummating it fully).

Historical Context

The Davidic covenant (2 Samuel 7:12-16) promised David's throne would endure forever. Despite the monarchy's end with Zedekiah's capture (597 BC) and the absence of Davidic kings during and after exile, God's promise remained. This prophecy assured exiles that God hadn't abandoned His covenant—a future David would arise. Jewish expectation of a Messiah ('anointed one') descended from David permeated Second Temple Judaism. When Jesus entered Jerusalem, crowds proclaimed 'Hosanna to the Son of David!' (Matthew 21:9), recognizing messianic claims. Jesus' teaching about being the Good Shepherd (John 10) and His resurrection establishing eternal reign fulfill Ezekiel's prophecy. The singular Shepherd unifies Jews and Gentiles into one flock (John 10:16, Ephesians 2:14-16).
