

Ezekiel 37:2

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And caused me to pass by them round about: and, behold, there were very many in the open valley; and, lo, they were very dry.

Analysis

"And caused me to pass by them round about: and, behold, there were very many in the open valley; and, lo, they were very dry." The phrase "very many" emphasizes comprehensive death—not just a few bones but the entire nation. "Very dry" indicates long-dead, not recently deceased—hope has long since vanished. God ensures Ezekiel fully comprehends the hopelessness before revealing the solution. This pattern appears throughout Scripture: God allows us to feel the full weight of impossibility before demonstrating His power. The gospel addresses such total death—humans aren't slightly sick but completely dead, requiring resurrection not resuscitation.

Historical Context

The exiles (587 BC) felt beyond hope—decades in captivity with no prospect of return. The "very dry" bones depicted decades of dispersion, not temporary setback. God wanted Ezekiel to grasp the magnitude of promised restoration: not minor improvement but resurrection from death. The vision's fulfillment began with the return from Babylon but finds complete expression in spiritual resurrection through the gospel. Every conversion demonstrates Ezekiel 37—God raising dead souls to spiritual life.
