

Ezekiel 41:11

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And the doors of the side chambers were toward the place that was left, one door toward the north, and another door toward the south: and the breadth of the place that was left was five cubits round about.

Analysis

The doors of the side chambers were toward the place that was left—the strategic placement of entrances toward the open space (hannitstsav, הַנִּתְסָב, that which was left/reserved) allowed access while maintaining temple sanctity. One door north, another south, created symmetrical access without compromising the east-west orientation toward God's glory.

The breadth of the place that was left was five cubits round about—this reserved space provided circulation and light, preventing the claustrophobic darkness that would dishonor God's dwelling. The repeated five-cubit measurement throughout the vision emphasizes divine order and mathematical perfection in God's design.

Historical Context

Ancient Near Eastern temples typically had storage chambers for cultic implements and priestly supplies. The vision's symmetrical north-south orientation differs from Solomon's temple, suggesting eschatological fulfillment beyond mere historical reconstruction.

Study Questions

1. How does the careful balance between accessibility and sanctity in temple design inform how we approach corporate worship?
2. What does the provision of light and space around God's dwelling teach about His desire for openness rather than obscurity?
