

Ezra 2:56

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Analysis

The children of Jaalah, the children of Darkon, the children of Giddel—More descendants of Solomon's servants, each name carrying theological significance. Jaalah (יַעֲלָה) means "mountain goat" or "to ascend," symbolizing the spiritual ascent from exile to Jerusalem. Darkon (דַּרְכֹן) means "carrier" or "rough," describing their servile labor. Giddel (גִּדֵּל) means "to make great" or "magnify."

The progression is prophetic: those who were "carriers" and "rough laborers" now "ascend" to Jerusalem to "magnify" the Lord. Exile refined their identity—they returned not as reluctant servants but as worshipers. This patterns Christian discipleship: bearing Christ's "rough" cross leads to ascension and glorifying God (Philippians 2:8-11).

Historical Context

These families descended from Canaanite populations Solomon subjected to levy service (mas oved) approximately 550 years earlier. Their preservation of distinct family identity through conquest, exile, and return demonstrates the stability of ancient Near Eastern social structures and the importance of genealogical records in post-exilic Jewish society.
