

Galatians 1:15

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace,

Analysis

But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, Paul shifts from his activity to God's sovereignty. "But when it pleased God" (hote de eudokēsen ho theos, ὅτε δὲ εὐδόκησεν ὁ θεός) emphasizes divine initiative and good pleasure—God's timing and purpose, not Paul's decision. Eudokeō (εὐδοκέω) expresses sovereign delight in executing His plan.

"Who separated me from my mother's womb" (ho aphorisas me ek koilias mētros mou) echoes prophetic calls—Isaiah 49:1, Jeremiah 1:5. Aphorizō (ἀφορίζω) means "set apart, consecrate." Paul's apostleship began not at conversion but before birth through divine predestination. This radically contradicts merit-based thinking—Paul was chosen before he could do anything good or bad (Romans 9:11).

"And called me by his grace" (kai kalesas dia tēs charitos autou) describes effectual calling. Kaleō (καλέω) in Paul means God's irresistible summons bringing salvation. "By his grace" (dia tēs charitos) specifies the means—unmerited favor, not earned selection. Paul's salvation and apostleship both flow from sovereign grace, establishing the theological foundation for justification by faith alone.

Historical Context

Paul's prenatal consecration parallels Old Testament prophets called before birth (Isaiah, Jeremiah, John the Baptist). This wasn't unique experience but shared pattern showing God's sovereignty in choosing servants. The Damascus road revelation (Acts 9) was temporal manifestation of eternal decree. Ancient Near Eastern kings often claimed divine election from birth; Paul applies this to demonstrate his apostolic authority equals the Twelve's. First-century Judaism debated free will versus predestination (Qumran scrolls, rabbinic literature). Paul firmly grounds salvation in God's sovereign election, not human decision, works, or merit—the same principle he applies to justification.

Study Questions

1. Why does knowing God chose you before birth (not because of anything you would do) transform both assurance and humility?
2. What does Paul's prenatal consecration teach about God's purposes for your life before you knew or chose Him?
3. Can you hold both God's sovereign election and urgent evangelism without compromising either truth?
