

Galatians 4:11

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain.

Analysis

I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain. Paul's pastoral anxiety. "I am afraid of you" (phoboumai hymas, φοβοῦμαι ὑμᾶς)—literally "I fear concerning you." Not fear of them but fear for them—alarm at their spiritual trajectory. "Lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain" (mē pōs eikē kekopiaka eis hymas)—that his missionary labors among them might prove fruitless. Kekopiaka (κεκοπίακα) is perfect tense, emphasizing the intensity and continuing effects of his past toil.

"In vain" (eikē, εἰκῇ) means without purpose, to no effect. Paul's fear isn't merely that they'd adopted wrong theology but that their defection indicated they'd never truly been saved. If justification is by faith plus law-keeping, then faith alone never saved them. Paul's apostolic anxiety reflected the stakes: this isn't minor error but potential apostasy. His love for them produced fear at their danger. True pastoral ministry involves both joy in believers' growth and appropriate fear when they drift toward destruction.

Historical Context

Paul's pattern was to establish churches, appoint elders, and move on (Acts 14:21-23). He trusted God and local leaders to maintain sound doctrine. The Galatians' rapid defection to a different gospel (1:6) within months or years of his departure caused deep alarm. His fear that his labor might be "in vain" echoed his concern for the Thessalonians (1 Thessalonians 3:5) and Philippians (Philippians

2:16). Apostolic ministry wasn't merely spreading ideas but birthing lasting spiritual life. False gospels threatened this.
