

Haggai 2:15

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And now, I pray you, consider from this day and upward, from before a stone was laid upon a stone in the temple of the LORD:

Analysis

And now, I pray you, consider from this day and upward, from before a stone was laid upon a stone in the temple of the LORD (עַתָּה שִׁמְעוּנָא לְבָבְכֶם מִן־) ve'attah simu-na levavkhem min-hayom hazeh vama'lah miterem sum-even el-even beheikhal YHWH)—God calls for reflection: consider (simu) "set your heart upon," as in 1:5, 7) the time before (miterem) they resumed building. Look back at the futility and connect it to spiritual cause. From before a stone was laid upon a stone—when the foundation sat abandoned, when no progress was being made, when they prioritized their own houses—remember that season's frustration.

This retrospective evaluation serves to demonstrate God's covenant faithfulness: when they neglected His house, He disciplined them with futility; now that they've resumed building (though still spiritually defiled, v.14), He will begin blessing (v.19). The transition point is this day (הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה/hayom hazeh)—the day God's word came (v.10, December 18, 520 BC), marking a turning point from curse to blessing based on renewed obedience.

Historical Context

For sixteen years (536-520 BC), the temple foundation lay untouched while the people built their own houses. That entire period was characterized by economic futility, drought, and frustration (1:6, 9-11). Three months after resuming work

(September to December 520 BC), God calls them to compare past futility with coming blessing, establishing the connection between obedience and divine favor.
