

Hebrews 5:3

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And by reason hereof he ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins.

Analysis

The Aaronic high priest 'must offer sacrifices for his own sins.' This necessity ('opheilei' - is obligated) reveals human priesthood's fundamental limitation. No fallen priest can perfectly mediate between God and man. Christ's sinlessness eliminates this need, making His sacrifice sufficient. Reformed substitutionary atonement requires a sinless substitute - Christ could die for others' sins precisely because He had no sin of His own requiring payment.

Historical Context

On the Day of Atonement (Leviticus 16), the high priest first sacrificed for his own sins before offering for the people's. This annual reminder of priestly inadequacy pointed to the need for a better priest.

1. How does the inadequacy of human mediators highlight Christ's sufficiency?

2. What does the priest's need for atonement teach about universal human sinfulness?
