

Isaiah 14:16

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and consider thee, saying, Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms;

Analysis

'They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and consider thee, saying, Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms?' Those who view the fallen king's corpse look intently ('narrowly look'—stare, gaze closely) and ponder in astonishment: 'Is THIS the one?' The question expresses shocked disbelief. This wretched corpse—this is the tyrant who terrorized nations? This insignificant remains—this is the conqueror who shook kingdoms? The verb 'consider' (בִּין) means to understand, discern, recognize—they're trying to reconcile past terror with present insignificance. Death and defeat reveal the emptiness behind all earthly pretensions. What seemed great proves small; what seemed terrible proves pitiable.

Historical Context

Throughout history, the deaths of tyrants have produced such reactions—Hitler's body, Mussolini's corpse, Ceausescu's execution. Those who wielded terrifying power appear pathetically human in death. The contrast between living terror and dead insignificance prompts observers to question how such limited humans exercised such devastating power. The answer is always the same: pride, violence, and spiritual darkness empower human tyranny, but death strips away pretense, revealing mere mortality. Revelation 18:9-19 describes similar reaction to Babylon's (symbolic) fall: those who profited from her stand in stunned disbelief.

Study Questions

1. How does the smallness of the dead tyrant warn against fearing earthly powers more than God?
2. What does the shocked question 'Is this the man?' teach about death revealing truth that life's power conceals?
