

Isaiah 2:8

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Their land also is full of idols; they worship the work of their own hands, that which their own fingers have made:

Analysis

The proliferation of idols—'work of their own hands'—indicts manufacturing gods, then worshipping human creation. This absurdity, emphasized by 'that which their own fingers have made,' exposes idolatry's irrationality: bowing to what we've fashioned. Paul later mocks this incoherence (Acts 17:29; Romans 1:23). The Reformed emphasis on Creator-creature distinction highlights that worship must flow from creature to Creator, never inverting this order. Idolatry represents supreme folly: serving what should serve us.

Historical Context

Archaeological discoveries confirm widespread idol production in Iron Age Judah—terracotta figurines, bronze images, and household shrines. Despite covenant monotheism, material idolatry pervaded Israelite religion.

Study Questions

1. What 'works of our own hands'—careers, families, ministries—do we subtly worship?
2. How does recognizing the absurdity of idolatry help us identify and forsake modern functional gods?
