

Isaiah 26:12

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

LORD, thou wilt ordain peace for us: for thou also hast wrought all our works in us.

Analysis

LORD, thou wilt ordain peace for us / יהָוה תִּשְׁפַּת־שָׁלוֹם לְנוּ (YHWH tishpot-shalom lanu)—The verb שָׁפַט (shaphat) means "to establish, ordain, or appoint." Isaiah affirms that shalom (peace, wholeness, comprehensive well-being) is God's sovereign gift, not human achievement. This peace encompasses reconciliation with God, inner tranquility, and eschatological restoration.

For thou also hast wrought all our works in us / קְיֻמָּת־מְעִשֵּׁינוּ פָּעַלְתָּךְ לְנוּ (ki gam kol-ma'asenu pa'alta lanu)—This declaration of monergism anticipates Paul's theology: "It is God who works in you both to will and to do" (Philippians 2:13). The verb פָּעַל (pa'al, "to work, accomplish") credits God as the ultimate source of all righteous deeds. Israel's faithfulness, like Christian sanctification, flows from divine enablement, not self-effort. This guards against both legalistic pride and antinomian passivity.

Historical Context

Isaiah 26 is part of the "Isaiah Apocalypse" (chapters 24-27), prophetic hymns anticipating God's final judgment and salvation. Written during the Assyrian threat (late 8th century BC), these chapters look beyond immediate historical crises to ultimate cosmic restoration. The emphasis on divine sovereignty over peace and human works countered Judah's temptation to secure safety through political alliances rather than trust in YHWH.

Study Questions

1. How does recognizing that God 'ordains peace' rather than us achieving it change your approach to anxiety and conflict?
2. What's the relationship between God working 'all our works in us' and our responsibility to obey? How do we avoid both passivity and self-reliance?
3. In what areas of life are you tempted to take credit for spiritual fruit that God has actually produced in you?
