

James 2:3

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool:

Analysis

And ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: Showing deference (epiblepsēte, ἐπιβλέψητε) to the well-dressed while telling the poor person to stand or sit underfoot reveals a heart enslaved to worldly honor. The commands "sit thou here" and "stand there" expose subtle yet painful marginalization.

James reveals how speech betrays partiality. Reformed ethics insist that love of neighbor is the fulfillment of the law; words assigning worth based on wealth violate the royal law.

Historical Context

House churches lacked enough seating; where someone sat communicated value. In a shame-honor culture, telling someone to sit "under the footstool" was deeply insulting. James ensures diaspora believers see such practices as incompatible with the gospel.
