

Jeremiah 17:9

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?

Analysis

This is one of Scripture's most penetrating assessments of human nature. The Hebrew aqov (אֲקָוֶן, "deceitful") comes from the same root as Jacob's name, meaning "heel-grabber" or "supplanter"—one who deceives and tricks. The heart is not merely mistaken but actively deceptive, skilled at self-justification and rationalization. "Above all things" (literally "from all") indicates the heart surpasses everything else in its capacity for deception.

"Desperately wicked" translates anush (עֲנוּשׁ), which can mean incurably sick, frail, or mortal. The heart's condition is terminal—beyond human remedy. The rhetorical question "who can know it?" emphasizes the depth and inscrutability of human corruption. We cannot even accurately diagnose our own hearts, let alone cure them.

This verse is foundational for the Reformed doctrine of total depravity. Not that humans are as evil as possible, but that sin affects every faculty, including moral judgment. The heart, which should guide us, is itself corrupted. This explains why all humanity sins (Rom 3:10-18, 23) and why regeneration must be God's sovereign work (Ezek 36:26, 2 Cor 5:17). Only divine omniscience can truly know the heart (Jer 17:10), and only divine power can transform it.

Historical Context

Ancient Near Eastern thought often located emotions, will, and moral consciousness in internal organs—heart, kidneys, liver. The Hebrew lev (לב, heart) encompassed the whole inner person, including intellect, affections, and will. Jeremiah's radical assessment of the heart's depravity challenged both ancient and modern assumptions about innate human goodness. This text became central to Reformed theological anthropology and debates about human nature.

Study Questions

1. How does this verse expose the inadequacy of trusting your own moral intuitions or emotions as guides for life?
2. In what ways have you experienced your heart's deceitfulness through self-justification or rationalization of sin?
3. How does the doctrine of the heart's depravity drive us to Christ as our only hope for transformation?
