

Jeremiah 24:7

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the LORD:
and they shall be my people, and I will be their God: for they shall return unto me with their whole heart.

Analysis

In the vision of good and bad figs representing the exiles and those who remained in Jerusalem, God promises regarding the exiles: 'I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the LORD: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God: for they shall return unto me with their whole heart.' This anticipates the new covenant promise (31:33) of internal transformation. God will give them a heart capable of truly knowing Him—not mere intellectual knowledge but personal, relational, transformative knowledge.

The phrase 'heart to know me' emphasizes that genuine knowledge of God requires more than mental assent—it requires heart transformation. The natural heart is hard, rebellious, incapable of truly knowing God (Romans 8:7). God must perform spiritual heart surgery, removing the heart of stone and giving a heart of flesh (Ezekiel 36:26). Only then can we know God as He truly is and respond appropriately. This is regeneration, the new birth Jesus described as essential for entering God's kingdom (John 3:3).

The promise 'they shall return unto me with their whole heart' describes genuine repentance that engages the whole person. Not merely outward conformity but wholehearted devotion. The exile would break Israel's divided loyalties and produce a remnant who truly sought God. This demonstrates God's redemptive purpose even in judgment—discipline intended to cure, not merely punish.

Historical Context

This vision came after the 597 BC exile when Jehoiachin and the elite were taken to Babylon. Those remaining in Jerusalem under Zedekiah considered themselves the faithful remnant, while viewing the exiles as rejected. God reverses this judgment: the exiles are the 'good figs' who will be preserved and brought back, while those remaining will be destroyed as 'bad figs.' The exile would purge unfaithfulness and produce a returning remnant with transformed hearts.
