

Jeremiah 5:27

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

As a cage is full of birds, so are their houses full of deceit:
therefore they are become great, and waxen rich.

Analysis

The exploitation intensifies: 'As a cage is full of birds, so are their houses full of deceit' (קְקַלְעַב מַלֵּא עֹזֶב כִּי בְתִּינְחָם מִרְמָה). The simile compares wealthy homes to bird cages crammed with trapped fowl—their prosperity derives from 'deceit' (mirmâ), meaning fraud, treachery, betrayal of trust. 'Therefore they are become great, and waxen rich' ('אַלְכֵן גָּדֵלָה וַיָּאִשְׁרֵה) shows cause and effect: wealth accumulation through injustice. The verbs gādal (become great) and 'āshar (become rich) indicate impressive external success—but built on exploitation. This condemns prosperity gained through unethical means. The New Testament echoes this: James 5:1-6 warns the rich who defraud laborers, and Jesus taught that treasures gained unjustly won't last (Luke 12:15-21, 16:19-31).

Historical Context

Ancient Near Eastern economies were predominantly agrarian with limited social mobility. Wealth concentration occurred through land acquisition via debt foreclosure, exploitative lending practices, and manipulation of legal systems. The wealthy class in Jerusalem—royal officials, priests, merchants—lived in luxury while rural populations struggled. Jeremiah 22:13-17 specifically condemns King Jehoiakim for building his palace with forced labor and unpaid wages. The 'deceit' included false weights and measures (Amos 8:5), bribery in courts (Micah 7:3), and economic oppression. Such injustice violated covenant stipulations and provoked divine judgment. The exile would redistribute wealth and humble the proud, fulfilling prophetic warnings that ill-gotten gain wouldn't endure.
