

Job 1:8

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And the LORD said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?

Analysis

God's question to Satan introduces the central conflict. The phrase 'Hast thou considered' (sam libbeka, שָׁמַח לִבְּךָ) literally means 'Have you set your heart/mind upon'—God directs Satan's attention to Job. The divine description repeats verse 1's language about Job being 'perfect and upright.' The phrase 'there is none like him in the earth' establishes Job's unique righteousness. This sets up Satan's accusation: does Job serve God freely or only for benefits? The text reveals God's sovereign control—Satan can only act with divine permission, bound by limits God sets.

Historical Context

The heavenly council scene (1:6-12) reflects ancient Near Eastern imagery where divine beings present themselves before the sovereign deity. Satan (ha-satan, הַשָּׂטָן) means 'the adversary,' appearing with the definite article suggesting a role or title. This dialogue format demonstrates that earthly events have heavenly dimensions—Job's suffering involves cosmic stakes regarding whether creatures can love God for Himself.
