

Job 11:7

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?

Analysis

Zophar asks: 'Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?' The verb chaqar (חָקַר, searching) means to investigate, examine, or explore deeply. Matsa (מָצָא, find out) means to discover or attain. Takhlit (תַּחְלִית, perfection) refers to completeness or ultimate extent. Zophar correctly asserts God's incomprehensibility—finite minds cannot fully grasp infinite being. However, he uses this truth to silence Job's questions rather than acknowledge mystery. The verse contains profound theology about divine transcendence but is weaponized against legitimate suffering.

Historical Context

Ancient wisdom acknowledged divine mystery and human limitation. Zophar's question echoes themes from Psalms (145:3, 'His greatness is unsearchable') and Isaiah (40:28). The problem isn't the theology but its application—Zophar uses God's incomprehensibility to dismiss Job's protests rather than sit humbly with mystery. This demonstrates how true doctrine can be employed to silence rather than comfort.
