

Job 12:23

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

He increaseth the nations, and destroyeth them: he enlargeth the nations, and straiteneth them again.

Analysis

'He increaseth the nations, and destroyeth them: he enlargeth the nations, and straiteneth them again.' The verbs form antithetical pairs: 'increaseth' (שָׁגַג, saggi) vs. 'destroyeth' (וַיִּאַבְדֵם, vay'abdem), 'enlargeth' (וַיַּרְחֵב, nochah) vs. 'straiteneth/leadeth away' (וַיִּנְחֵם, vaynchem). Job describes God's sovereign control over empires—raising and razing nations according to His purposes. This echoes Daniel 2:21, Acts 17:26, and anticipates Habakkuk's wrestling with God using wicked Babylon as His instrument. If God governs empires without simple moral causation, why assume He governs individuals that way? Job undermines the friends' theology by appeal to observable history. The Reformed doctrine of God's sovereign governance of history for His glory validates Job's observation.

Historical Context

Ancient peoples witnessed empires rise and fall—Egypt, Assyria, Babylon. Job's audience would recognize this pattern and its theological implications about divine sovereignty transcending simple retribution.
