

Job 21:18

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

They are as stubble before the wind, and as chaff that the storm carrieth away.

Analysis

Do the wicked suffer like chaff: 'God distributeth sorrows in his anger.' Job continues questioning—does God actually distribute sorrows to the wicked as frequently as claimed? The imagery of chaff blown by wind and stubble carried by storm suggests how the wicked should be swept away. Job asks: does this actually happen consistently? His honest questioning doesn't deny God's justice but challenges mechanical application of retribution theology.

Historical Context

Chaff and stubble were proverbial images for the wicked's fate (Psalm 1:4, Isaiah 40:24). Winnowing separated grain from chaff, with wind carrying away the worthless husks. Job questions whether this prophetic-poetic language describes immediate temporal reality or eschatological judgment.

Study Questions

1. How do we interpret prophetic and poetic descriptions of judgment as both true and not always immediate?
2. What is the difference between denying divine justice and questioning its timing?
3. How does eschatological judgment resolve apparent temporal injustice?
