

Job 22:23

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

If thou return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up, thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles.

Analysis

Eliphaz counsels Job: "If thou return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up." The Hebrew banah (בָּנָה, "built up") evokes construction and restoration—a rebuilding of Job's fortunes. The conditional "if" assumes Job has departed from God, requiring repentance. Eliphaz's theology contains truth: genuine repentance does lead to restoration. Yet he errs in assuming Job's suffering proves Job's sin. Reformed theology distinguishes between

1. suffering as judgment for specific sins (David and Bathsheba)
2. suffering as fatherly discipline (Hebrews 12:6),
3. suffering as mysterious providence for God's purposes (Job, Joseph).

Eliphaz's counsel would be appropriate for category (1) but fails to recognize Job's situation as category (3). This highlights the danger of universal application of particular biblical principles without wisdom to discern contexts.

Historical Context

The promise of restoration upon repentance was central to covenant theology (Deuteronomy 30:1-3, Jeremiah 29:12-14). Israel's exile and restoration patterns reinforced this. However, the post-exilic period raised new questions when faithful Jews suffered under foreign oppression despite covenant faithfulness. Job addresses this tension: what when the restoration formula doesn't apply because the sufferer hasn't departed from God?

Study Questions

1. How can we discern whether suffering calls for repentance, patient endurance, or some other response?
2. What dangers arise when we apply biblical promises of restoration without considering their specific contexts?
3. How does Job's experience prepare us for Jesus' teaching that suffering isn't always proportional to sin (John 9:1-3)?
