

Job 26:10

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

He hath compassed the waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end.

Analysis

Job declares God "hath compassed the waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end." The verb chaq (חָקַ, "compassed") means to inscribe or decree a boundary. God has set limits (choq, חֹק) upon the waters—the same word used for divine statutes and laws. This poetic description recalls Genesis 1:9 where God gathered waters into one place, and Jeremiah 5:22 where God set sand as the sea's boundary. From a Reformed perspective, this illustrates God's sovereign governance of creation through established laws. The phrase "until the day and night come to an end" points to creation's temporal nature—these boundaries persist until the eschaton when there will be no more sea (Revelation 21:1). Job's observation combines cosmology and eschatology: God not only created order but maintains it until the appointed consummation. This challenges ancient chaos-combat myths where cosmic order constantly required divine battle against chaos forces.

Historical Context

Ancient Near Eastern cosmologies depicted creation as ongoing battle against primordial waters (Tiamat in Enuma Elish, Yam in Ugaritic texts). Job's portrayal differs radically: God simply decrees boundaries, and chaotic waters obey. No struggle, no uncertainty—just sovereign command. This reflects Genesis 1's controlled, ordered creation account and distinguishes Israelite theology from mythological worldviews of surrounding cultures.

Study Questions

1. How does God's sovereign ordering of creation inform our understanding of natural laws and scientific inquiry?
2. What does the temporal nature of creation's current order ("until the day and night come to an end") teach us about Christian hope?
3. How might Job's confidence in God's cosmic sovereignty encourage us when our personal lives feel chaotic?
