

Job 26:7

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing.

Analysis

Job declares: 'He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing.' The verb natah (נָטָה, stretcheth) means to spread out or extend. Tsaphon (צָפוֹן, north) may refer to the northern sky or celestial regions. Tohu (תֹהוּ, empty place) means emptiness or formless void—the same word in Genesis 1:2. The phrase 'hangeth the earth upon nothing' (toleh eretz al-belimah, תֹלֵה אֶרֶץ עַל-בִּלְמִימָה) describes earth suspended in space—remarkably accurate cosmology for ancient times. Job affirms God's creative power and wisdom, refuting any suggestion that he doubts divine sovereignty.

Historical Context

Ancient Near Eastern cosmologies typically portrayed earth resting on pillars, animals, or divine beings. Job's description of earth hanging on nothing is scientifically remarkable, possibly inspired revelation. The passage appears in Job's response to Bildad, demonstrating that Job's protests don't reflect ignorance of or doubt about God's power—he questions divine purposes while affirming divine attributes.

Study Questions

1. How does Job's affirmation of God's creative power demonstrate that questioning God's purposes doesn't deny His attributes?
2. What does this scientifically accurate cosmology suggest about the inspiration of Scripture?
