

Job 27:11

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

I will teach you by the hand of God: that which is with the Almighty will I not conceal.

Analysis

I will teach you by the hand of God (אוֹרָה אֶתְכֶם בְּיַד־אֱלֹהִים)—the phrase beyad-El (בְּיַד־אֱלֹהִים, by God's hand) indicates authority and instrumentality. Job claims to teach divine truth, positioning himself as God's spokesman against his friends' faulty theology. The verb yarah (יָרָה) means to instruct or direct, the root of Torah.

That which is with the Almighty will I not conceal (אֲשֶׁר עִם־יְהוָה לֹא אֶכְחֹד)—Job vows full disclosure of truth about God. The verb kachad (כָּחַד) means to hide or conceal. This combines prophetic authority (teaching by God's hand) with prophetic responsibility (not withholding revealed truth). Job assumes the role his friends claimed—true interpreter of divine ways—but with opposite conclusions. Where they declared that suffering proves sin, Job will declare that the Almighty's ways transcend simplistic retribution. This prefigures Jesus's claim: 'I have not spoken in secret' (Isaiah 48:16; John 18:20) and the apostolic mandate to declare 'the whole counsel of God' (Acts 20:27).

Historical Context

Ancient Near Eastern wisdom teachers claimed divine authorization for their instruction, but Job uniquely inverts the dialogue's power dynamic—the sufferer becomes the teacher, correcting the comfortable. This anticipates the gospel pattern where the crucified one proves wiser than human wisdom (1 Corinthians 1:25).

Study Questions

1. How does Job's commitment to teaching divine truth despite personal suffering challenge comfortable theology?
2. What does it mean to teach 'by the hand of God' in a way that doesn't conceal difficult truths about divine sovereignty?
3. In what ways should suffering qualify (rather than disqualify) someone for teaching about God's character?
