

Job 29:5

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

When the Almighty was yet with me, when my children were about me;

Analysis

When the Almighty was yet with me—the divine name אֵלֹהִים (Shaddai, Almighty) appears 31 times in Job (more than the rest of the Old Testament combined), emphasizing God's power and sovereignty. The phrase was yet with me uses עִמָּדִי (immadi, with me), indicating intimate presence. Job laments God's felt absence—not theological denial of omnipresence but experiential loss of conscious fellowship. When my children were about me uses סְבִיבוֹתַי (sevivotay, around me/surrounding me)—his children encircled him like a protective hedge, the same word used in 1:10 where Satan complains God hedged Job in. That hedge is now gone.

This verse poignantly captures Job's double loss: God's sensed presence and his children's actual presence. The parallelism links these—God's presence was experienced partly through family blessing. Job doesn't merely miss his children; he misses the sense of divine favor they represented. Ancient theology understood children as covenant blessings (Psalm 127:3-5), so losing them suggested losing God's favor. Job's grief is compounded: he mourns his children and questions God's continued presence.

Historical Context

In patriarchal culture, children (especially sons) represented legacy, security in old age, and divine blessing. The phrase "about me" suggests a protective circle—children gathered around their father for guidance, provision, and blessing. Job's former life included this relational richness. The loss of all ten children in a single day (1:18-19) was catastrophic not only emotionally but theologically—it seemed to prove God's disfavor, which Job's friends argued explicitly.

Study Questions

1. How do we distinguish between God's actual presence (theological reality) and felt presence (experiential reality) during suffering?
2. What blessings or relationships have represented God's favor to you, and how would their loss challenge your faith?
3. How can we maintain confidence in God's presence when circumstances suggest His absence?
