

Job 36:2

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Suffer me a little, and I will shew thee that I have yet to speak on God's behalf.

Analysis

Suffer me a little, and I will shew thee—The verb קָתַר (kattar, "suffer/bear with") requests patience, literally meaning "surround" or "wait around." Elihu asks Job to endure one more speech. The phrase I have yet to speak on God's behalf uses לְאֱלֹהָה (le'eloah), emphasizing Elihu's role as theodicy's defender—one who vindicates God's justice against Job's complaints.

This verse reveals Elihu's theological boldness: he claims to speak FOR God, not merely ABOUT God. While presumptuous on the surface, chapters 32-37 receive no divine rebuke (unlike the three friends in 42:7), suggesting Elihu's theology, though incomplete, moves in the right direction. His assertion "I have yet to speak" implies the three friends left crucial aspects of God's character unexplained. Paul echoes this advocacy role in Romans 3:4-6, defending God's righteousness against human accusations.

Historical Context

Ancient Near Eastern legal proceedings included advocates who spoke on behalf of absent parties. Elihu assumes this forensic role, acting as God's defense attorney in Job's lawsuit against divine justice. His request for patience reflects wisdom literature's emphasis on careful listening before speaking (Proverbs 18:13). The cultural context valued lengthy deliberation—truth emerged through extended dialogue, not quick answers. Elihu's youthful zeal contrasts with the friends' weary repetition, bringing fresh energy to the theological debate.
