

Job 8:20

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man, neither will he help the evil doers:

Analysis

Bildad concludes: 'Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man, neither will he help the evil doers.' The verb ma'as (מָאַס, cast away) means to reject or despise. Tam (טָם, perfect) is the same word describing Job in 1:1—complete or having integrity. Bildad's logic appears sound: God doesn't reject the righteous or aid the wicked. The problem is the implied accusation: since Job is suffering (apparently cast away), he must not truly be perfect. Bildad cannot accept that God might test the perfect or that suffering serves purposes beyond punishment.

Historical Context

Bildad appeals to observable patterns: the righteous generally prosper, the wicked generally suffer. Proverbs teaches these patterns as normative. However, Bildad elevates pattern to absolute law, leaving no room for exceptions or divine mystery. His speech promises that if Job repents, God will restore him (8:5-7), assuming Job's suffering results from sin requiring repentance.

Study Questions

1. How do we hold biblical principles about sowing and reaping without making them absolute laws that deny mystery?
2. What does Bildad's error teach about the limits of human wisdom in understanding God's ways?
