

Job 9:10

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Which doeth great things past finding out; yea, and wonders without number.

Analysis

---

Job continues describing divine works: 'Which doeth great things past finding out; yea, and wonders without number.' The phrase 'past finding out' (ad-ein cheqer, עַד-חֵקֵר אֵין) means beyond investigation or search—God's works exceed human comprehension. 'Wonders' (pele, פֶּלִא) denotes marvelous, extraordinary acts. The phrase 'without number' (ad-ein mispar, עַד-אֵין מִסְפָּר) emphasizes infinite abundance—we cannot count God's wonderful works.

Job quotes or echoes Eliphaz's earlier words (5:9), showing he listened to his friend's theology. However, Job applies the same truth differently: Eliphaz used God's inscrutable ways to argue Job should submit and repent; Job uses them to show the impossibility of understanding or contending with God. Same theology, different application—illustrating how doctrine's pastoral application matters as much as its accuracy.

Paul echoes this in Romans 11:33: 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!' But Paul's context celebrates grace's mystery, while Job wrestles with providence's inscrutability. Both are valid responses to divine transcendence—worship and questioning belong together in genuine faith.

Historical Context

Ancient wisdom traditions emphasized the limits of human knowledge before divine mysteries. Job's acknowledgment of God's incomprehensibility reflects this wisdom while adding existential urgency—the God whose ways cannot be fathomed is the same God who afflicts Job without apparent cause.

Study Questions

1. How do we balance intellectual humility (God's ways are past finding out) with confident trust (God's ways are good)?
2. What does Job's wrestling with divine inscrutability teach about the legitimacy of asking 'why' even when answers don't come?
3. In what ways does Christ's revelation make God's ways less inscrutable while maintaining proper divine transcendence?
